a man who lived a placid life he was that man. There is scarcely a ripple on the surface of his career. From his birth to his death there were not incidents enough to make a headline in a modern newspaper. He was a commonplace man, an actor in no great public events, yielding instead of standing up for his rights, as meek as Moses. He was kicked and cuffed about by Ishmael in his youth, yet he never struck back. He was led to an altar of sacrifice in his manhood, and he uttered no protest. Even his wife was selected for him by his father, and he took her for better or worse without cavil. He was robbed by the Philistines of the wells which his father had dug and he simply moved on to another place. He was deceived by his own children on his dying bed, yet he gave up his inheritances without a murmur. And see how much better it was for him, in his everyday experiences and posthumous fame, than as if he had fought for his rights, everlastingly squabbled with his neighbors, fared hard every time he was insulted, struck out whenever his corns were trod upon, and burst his puckering heart in an effort to get even with his enemies.

It does not always follow that the man who makes the most noise in the world is the most useful. Brigadier generals look nice on dress parade, but when it comes to a battle, a private soldier in dust-covered jeans does the business. The cork floats on the top of the wave and the wave imagines it is directing the course; it is possible to spread oneself over so much space as to be of no use anywhere; but it does not follow that because a man's influence is in everybody's way he has reached the highest point of usefulness.

Of Interest to Small Operator.

Under the recent ruling of the Inter-State commerce commission railroads are required to furnish cars to shippers within six days after order is placed of dimensions ordered. This order will benefit the smaller shipper of lumber and coal who generally hasty wait til the larger operator is shipped and to a large measure prevents tipping of the car distributor. Sometime ago an agent was approached by a shipper and chastised for not placing a car to be loaded and the agent said: "You are the only man that didn't cough up."

Printing Stamps of Glue.

Printing stamps quickly made from a mold of rubber are a German invention. Several sheets of tinfoil are placed on the type form, covered with paper, a deep impression is taken from the form, the resulting tinfoil matrix is cut and surrounded with oiled paper. Melted joiners' glue mixed with the printers' roller composition is poured for the casting. The stamp is mounted on a wooden handle. The stamp, though rather soft at first, will keep a few days without losing its printing elasticity.
